I found this: or of their own right than to serve the interests of the party. In many cases the determining factor will be the significance of the financial stakes involved, not simply the culpability of the individual involved. So, for example, the bribery of a police officer in South Africa by an international mining company to prevent the company from being prosecuted for environmental crimes in the country is perfectly legal, even though the crime committed was a flagrant example of corruption and criminality. But by the same token, if an international police authority were to pay a police force to prevent the exposure of international corruption in its ranks, that would be illegal, regardless of the effect of such corruption on the country concerned. A national regime that produced dishonest or corrupt individuals in its ranks should be addressed through such regulatory processes, and not by the courts, the law-making arm of government. That is not to say that only the courts should be able to investigate such matters, but that such investigations should be the prerogative of the legal system, and should be accountable to the community. If the courts are just the final check on the process, and the main means by which corrupt or dishonest persons can be held to account, then the accountability mechanism is not working. Finally, it is important to remember that there are significant differences between the justiciability of public and private law, as the issue of public interest comes into play in the latter case. This will be explored in the next instalment. Michael Hill is a barrister at Freehills.
